Double or Nothing: A Friends to Lovers Menage Romance By Kelli Wolfe

I froze in his arms, his bare chest warm and firm against my back, my pulse hammering in my veins while I tried to remember how to breathe.

Living at home while she went to college has been the biggest mistake of Melanie's life. When her mom's snooping finally drives her over the edge Mel escapes to the sunny beaches of California with the help of her two best friends, Jacob and Keith. These two bad boys have been riding to her rescue and filling the role of her guardian angels practically forever, and when she moves in with them all is right with the world for the first time since they moved away five years ago.

But things aren't the same between them, and there's nothing angelic about the thoughts she's having about her buff, bronzed roommates. As hard as she fights the growing attraction she feels for them Mel finds herself falling still harder, trapped in an impossible situation. How can she possibly choose between them when picking either one could destroy the friendship that means everything to her?

From the Inside Flap

I let them lead me out onto the already crowded sand and noticed quickly that the crowd on the southern side of the beach was mostly made up of families, while the northern side was thronged with surfers and small knots of younger people like us. Jacob planted our cooler in the sand near a volleyball net and we unloaded our towels alongside it. Then the guys peeled off their shirts and suddenly I felt as though I was on a Colorado mountain top instead of at sea level. I don't know where all the oxygen disappeared to, but I couldn't seem to get any.

"What are you doing?" Keith asked as I scanned the ground around us frantically.

"Looking for a club to beat off the girls when they mob us."

Jacob and Keith traded sardonic looks.

"You're not in Kansas anymore, Toto," Jacob told me. "Take a look around; it's not like we're the only guys out here."

I didn't need to look around--the two of them had me hyperventilating all by themselves. Between them they seemed to have acres of golden, sun-drenched skin stretched over lean muscle that rippled with every movement, every breath. I felt an almost irresistible compulsion to run my hands over their bodies, to feel that warm, satiny hardness under my fingertips. Even worse, I wanted to brush my lips against them, to taste them with my tongue while I kissed every last inch of those firm, bronzed bodies.

Despite the warmth of the sun I shivered, my tongue darting out to wet lips gone bone dry. This was crazy; I had been single too long and my hormones were all out of whack. If I kept having these bizarre reactions to Jacob and Keith there was no way that staying with them was going to work. I had to get myself under control and fast. What I needed was a little distance, a few moments alone to pull myself together.

I tugged my t-shirt over my head and started to kick off my flip-flops when a low wolf-whistle stopped me cold.

"Well, well," Keith rumbled in a low voice that vibrated all the way down into my bones. "Our little Melanie is all grown up. We may need that club after all, eh Jacob?"

Bright green eyes glittered with amusement. "You could be right about that. She definitely outgrew that scrawny, awkward phase she was in when we left."

"Nope. There's nothing scrawny about her now," Keith said, his own eyes teasingly running from my hair to my toes.

My face went hot and I knew I was beet red. "Oh. My. God. You two lechers haven't changed a bit, have you?"

Jacob grinned unapologetically. "Nope. Did you really think we would?"

"No," I sighed. "I suppose not."

A volleyball appeared as if by magic in Keith's hands. "So, who gets Melanie on his team?"

"We'll flip for it," Jacob said. "Call it in the air."

A quarter glittered in the sun. "Tails."

Jacob grinned again as he smacked it against the back of his hand. "Oh, too bad. It was heads."

"Naturally. Come on, Mel."

I looked at him blankly. "But you lost."

"Exactly."

I fixed them with my best impersonation of my mom's glare. "I am going to beat the two of you to death with my flip-flops."

"Okay, but after the game," Jacob said. "Want a handicap, Keith? How many points should I spot you? Twenty bucks says I'll be up ten points in ten minutes anyway."

"Fine. But go easy on her," Keith grumbled. "It's her first day."

I stepped up to the net while Keith tossed Jacob the ball. "Oh, just serve already."

"Okay. Here it comes."

Jacob smacked the ball in an easy lob that floated low towards the net. Before it made it across I jumped high to meet it and spiked it straight down into the sand on Jacob's side. As I landed I did a little pirouette in the sand and allowed myself a self-satisfied smirk.

"Tah-dah!"

For long seconds both guys stared at me, speechless.

"Two years of varsity volleyball, guys. You might have asked before you started running your mouths--something else which hasn't changed, apparently. I believe it's our serve."

When I glanced back Keith's grin stretched from ear to ear.

"What do you say, Jacob? Double or nothing?"

"Just shut up and serve."

There was no more Mr. Nice Guy after that; the boys got down to business and the gloves came off. I had no idea until then that beach volleyball is a blood sport--or at least it was the way those two played it. When they went full out it took everything I had to keep up with them. Before long I was sweaty and covered in sand and my hair was a wreck. It was the most fun I'd had in ages.

Jacob served again and the ball sailed high in an arc over my head. Desperately I jumped for it, throwing myself in a wild backwards leap. At the last second my fists hammered the ball back over the net, but I misjudged my landing and stumbled in the sand, limbs flailing--right into Keith.

Arms like velvet-covered steel wrapped around my stomach and pulled me tightly against him before I could fall. Where our skin touched hot tingles exploded through me and surged along every nerve I had. I froze in his arms, his bare chest warm and firm against my back, my pulse hammering in my veins while I tried to remember how to breathe.

"Are you okay?"

His breath tickled against my ear and my body came alive, painfully aware of the incredibly sexy guy I was pressed up against. While one part of my brain yelled frantically at me to stand up, another part noticed how lovely it felt and insisted that it would be even nicer if I just relaxed into Keith's embrace and laid my head back against him. My throat wouldn't work so all I could manage was a jerky nod.

"Upsy-daisy," he murmured as he set me back onto my feet.

I wobbled a bit, but managed to remain upright despite the thoughts swirling dizzyingly through my head and called for a break to get some cold water out of the cooler. This couldn't go on; I couldn't handle being this turned on by the two of them every day. Eventually I was going to slip up without meaning to and that would ruin everything for the three of us. There were tons of hot guys all over the beach; I needed to find one to satisfy that part of my life so I could enjoy my time with my two best friends without constantly being at the mercy of my inappropriate reactions to them.

Of course finding another guy would have meant taking my eyes off of Jacob and Keith for more than five minutes, and somehow I just couldn't manage to do that.
